Santa's Helpers?

In the classic Christmas comedy "Elf," Will Ferrell plays the role of Buddy, a human raised by Santa and his elves at the North Pole. (No plot spoilers here, as I'm not focusing on the plot. But it's a truly funny movie.) As in every story involving Santa's helpers, there are workshop scenes featuring lines of elves feverishly working on building toys for Santa to deliver to children all over the world on Christmas Eve. Typically, there's stress as the deadline approaches and something always goes wrong. While this provides fodder for comedy, we can relate to the elves' anxiety – our hurried Christmas shopping and holiday planning goes into overdrive and we find ourselves FAR from "peace on earth, goodwill toward men."

As I write this, I can look at our church sanctuary and the rows of tables set up to receive thousands of shoeboxes. It's our annual collection week for Operation Christmas Child, and scores of volunteers have put in many hours collecting and packing thousands of boxes. Like the toys of Santa's workshop, these shoebox gifts filled with toys and helpful supplies will be delivered around the world to millions of children. (Last year, almost 12 million shoebox gifts were delivered to 170 countries.) UNLIKE Santa's gifts, these shoeboxes also contain the story of Jesus – the greatest Gift of all – and an opportunity for the child to learn more about Him at a local church.

We aren't Santa's helpers! But we most certainly can be servants of our King who work throughout the year to bless others. It might be working for Operation Christmas Child, volunteering at the Easter Egg Hunt, the Carnival, and Trunk-or-Treat, or serving in over 25 other church ministries. Yes, sometimes we get stressed out. Sometimes things go wrong – or at least not as we expect. But we trust in our King to guide us as we use our spiritual gifts to bless others. Our focus is on glorifying God, not ourselves. So I want to thank you for serving our Lord, and wish you a very merry and Christ-focused Christmas!

-OOPastor Ben
